By EARL TUCKER Political campaigns ain't like they used to be and for the benefit of the younger gener ation I shall attempt to give a smattering idea of how they used to be run. The first political campaign in which I became involved was fifty years ago, when I was approaching my eighth birthday. My father, who was editor of the local paper at that time, was always interest edin the various races, a though I don't remember him ever supporting a winning candidate. When the returns came in, though, a week later, he never seemed to be too dis appointed, and always remark ed that the issue lost-not his candidate. I was too young to remember what all of the issues were, but prohibition and woman suffrage were always at the top. Women, at that time, were not allowed to vote, but they were begin ning to get organized and most of the politicians saw the handwriting on the wall. Arguments for permitting the women to vote were num erous. They would "clean up" politics. Looking back, this was pretty silly reasoning, but it nust have sounded good then. Another argument was that women were becoming better nformed and more intereste after all, they were citizens. Those who opposed giving the vote to women argued tha politics was a job for men and hat women would lose thei

eir thinking. While the didn't say so in stump speech es, candidates secretly tolo their male friends that once the women got the vote they yould start holding down jobs in business and might eventually start running for publi offices. They sure hit the nail The wets and the drys were at it even back in those days.
